China's 18th century economic path dependency can be described as one of the "market success" because the empire enjoyed prosperity, there was little inflation or deflation, unemployment was minimal and social grievances few. In the reticular market economy, the number of markets increased, cleared, and were competitive. Sometimes lineages tried to control local markets and prevent outsiders from entering. But suppliers and buyers then expanded, and their activities undermined the power of these monopolists to control markets for very long.
